Later developments made it clear Grand MU'II had actually left France three days before date Bidault inquiry. #3 Source commented above incident not to be taken as supportive of possible collusion on part of Laiset but as illustrative of general attitude French police toward Grand MU'II who in past instances of police surveillance had received such close protection and so many favors from high quasi-d'oree officials that police ultimately become indifferent to his movements. #4 Same source said French government circles in general increasingly convinced escape was inspired and arranged by British.
